Charles did not interfere, as he wished the Puritans to feel that Parliament would not spare them, and that their only hope lay in his indulgence. The new Parliament, therefore, which met in 1661, passed a series of persecuting statutes. I. The Act of Uniformity, 1661, required every clergyman, fellow of a college, or schoolmaster to accept everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer. Under this Act two thousand clergymen lost their livings. II. The Corporation Act, 66, compelled all persons holding office in corporate towns (where the Puritans were most numerous) to renounce the Covenant, to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, and to declare upon oath that they considered resistance to the king wicked under any circumstances. III. The Conventicle Act, 1664, forbade, under heavy penalties, any meeting for purposes of worship attended...
